Mikhail Torrance is a very underrated prospect. Standing at 6'5", Torrance has the perfect size for a combo guard. He primarily played point guard during his senior year, but should be able to play and defend both guard positions in the NBA. Offensively, Torrance has very good ball handling skills and is a good passer. He translates well as a NBA point guard due to his ball handling, passing and driving skills. He is a very good athlete for a point guard and has the speed and quickness to play in a high tempo offense.

A question offensively for Torrance is does he have legit 3-point range or not. His jump shot and range improved during his senior year, but whether or not defenders need to respect his shooting ability remains to be a question. For his athleticism and size, Torrance is not a good defender. However, since he has those natural talents, he can become a good defender if he puts in the effort. If Torrance wants to be the best combo guard he can be, an area he will need to get better at is rebounding. His rebounding numbers were not very impressive at Alabama.
